

Abstract

Since the late 1990s, Japan has monotonously lost international competitiveness, mainly because science-based industries have failed to build integrated networks of open and agile innovators. Why has Japan failed to construct such networks? The purpose of this work is to discover reasons and mechanisms of this failure, based on a new innovation model.